"The prayers and lamentations of my companions soon became weak; sohs, sighs, growns, and graping succeeded as suffication set in, and each periched in succession. Light seemed to flush out of my eyes; there came ere long a rearing in my cars; a mighty weight appeared oppress my chest, and in a little time I strange sensation came over me, conscious that is must be death. Yet, though I was a boy, I had no dread of it—not half so much as I should have of it now.

"How long I lay in that condition can scarcely tell you; but I did come round again, else I wouldn't have been here to spin this yarn to day.

"I had been nearer the mouth of the cavern than my companions, and when the tide had completely ebbed, there was left between the fallen mass of rock and the sand a little cranny, through which there came now a ray of light, and tho current of fresh air from the sea that had preserved and revived me.

" By this pale light I could see the white and distorted faces of my dead shipmates, many of whom were in strange. positions, that told plainly of the ageny in which they had perished,

"I was full of intense borror at the idea of being thus confined with the dead, and I gazed at them fearfully, my heart beating fast and painfully, as my even became accustomed to the dim twillight admitted by the cranny, which are long I knew would be closed by the returning

"On examining it, I found that it could be enlarged by scraping away the sand, and with my heart filled with prayer, gratitude, and hope, to this task I at once addressed myself with an energy born of dread and dismay, and so active ly did I work that in ten minutes I had scraped out a hole large enough for me to creep through, and painfully and arduously I drew myself out on my hands and knees, and ere long found myself breathing the free air of heaven on the strip of beach where the fragments of the wreck were lying.

"The sun was setting, and thus I know I had spent a whole day in company with the dead. Other tomb than that cavern they had none, for when I came back to the spot, accompanied by a party of the Constguard, whose station was on the summit of the clift, we found that auother enormous mass of the impending cliff had fallen from above, and closed up the cavern forever; thus I had just
